

AP Laserphoto

But where's the remote control?

David Creech demonstrates the 19th-century game of hoop rolling at the

Henry Ford Museum and Greenfield Village in Dearborn, Mich., recently, showing two 20th-century kids what life was like before Nintendo.

International plays perspective on what we might consider cold, stale negotiating," he adds. "The characters upon which the play is based used the woods to talk. There they were free from distractions and threats of being bugged."

Playing the Soviet, Andrey Botvinnick, is Michael D. Eaton of Orem, a theater teacher at American Fork Junior High School. Jason Butler of Orem, a Sterling scholar in drama, plays the American, John Honeyman.

Playwright Blessing is perhaps best known for his work, "War of the Roses," a play that became a movie starring Michael Douglas and Kathleen Turner.

Continuing the international angle is "The Strong Breed," a Nigerian play by Nobel Prize-winning author Wole Soyinka. The work examines the necessity of understanding the ways of those with whom one lives.

"There's a popular saying in Africa that you have to be like a chameleon," says Kazadi Big Mungangi of Nigeria, a Ph.D. candidate at BYU and the play's director. "A chameleon takes the color of the area. If you are not able to do that, you are going to get eaten. The leading character in this play did not understand his need to adapt and suffers a sad fate. I understand from my own experiences how difficult it is to be in touch with people from different areas, but I've learned to survive."

Heading the cast will be Chris Jorgensen as Elnan. Other players include Loralee Chandler, Eric Nicol, Stephen Carroll, Maureen Sellers, Dave Graham and Jeff Ernst.

olls' popular stop

with the older folks," Lambert said.

His point was illustrated when one woman unaccountably muffed a short underhanded delivery from Dakota, Jackson, Miss., and Brownsville, Texas. Only 900 miles or so and you're there.

On the 140-mile trip south from St. Louis on Interstate 55, I am-

Photo courtesy of BYU

"A Walk in the Woods" is a story of two arms dealers in Geneva

BYU graduate student chosen as Getty Fellow

A Brigham Young University doctoral student and part-time member of the art education faculty has been chosen as a Getty Fellow. Michael Day, one of Gray's advisers, was selected through an open, national competition administered by Getty, according to Michael Day.